

Collaboration

The essence of a good relationship beckons on how well we collaborate. Proper collaboration serves as a blending or merging tool between two or more parties involved in communication. What really happens when we collaborate is allowing each party to say what they need to say. In turn, each party speaks on behalf of what is most important to them, or what they represent.

By fostering collaboration, the intent of the communication stays in focus as each party has the privilege to remind the other party about the intent or purpose of the conversation. This back and forth communication cycle serves as a process; actually, a process of (1) eliminating unnecessary elements and (2) building workable elements. So to speak, collaboration is a system which infers the qualities of: implementation, evaluation, reprocessing, and efficiency.

Understand that any form of communication is behavioral and requires learning. Successful management requires utmost attention to excel in this arena of organizational management. Take the time to train all levels of management, staff and employees to better equip themselves.
