

Growth and Prosperity

Nature constantly rejuvenates itself. Sometimes, it burns itself down only to generate new soil for future growth. Thus, we can say that Nature is cyclical, ever expanding, and uses some automated process. The same applies to humans and corporations, as well. There's a balance between growth and prosperity. To prosper, you need growth. In many cases, growth needs to be manicured to make ready for new and better growth, and in gardening and investments. It can be concluded that growth infers action, and prosperity infers accumulation.

Sometimes, we seem not able to justify the changes between growth and prosperity, but in the long run, it all works as a unifying activity. Growth occurs in the "Now", while prosperity ferments. If you don't weed the garden, the vegetables get strangled and never ferment. If you want good tomatoes, keep the garden clear.

In order for your prosperity to satisfy you, you must attend to the cultivation demands of growth. If your closet is full of old clothing and shoes, how can you put new clothing in it? If you desire change in others, then first find change in yourself. If you want to succeed in life (a prosperity), then make sure your mind and heart are free from mental and emotions debris (a growth).
