

Success

The only true definition of success is to arrive at something better. There are probably thousands of meanings for the term success, though it can be said that success can make you happier. Writing a book, scoring a goal, finding the right partner may be considered successful, but then will the book be read, the game won, and the marriage last? Success is governed by time and value. The baby's first step is a time governed event, and the value can be express by exuberance.

That being said, the onus of success greatly depends on the perceptions and sensitivity of its creator. Success also has social connotations to it. How does society consider success? It may have different time and values placed upon it. Everyone wants to be success in his or her own right. It's a universal attribute. The DNA within every cell in your body strives to be healthy, well nourished, and expansive. That's success, is it not? Otherwise, you'd be in trouble. It would be fair to say, that your human nature has success built into it: physically and psychologically.

Keeping things simple, the keys to understanding success are governed by these principles: betterment, happiness, time and space, self-perceptions. Whether an individual, a team, or a community, it is really up to the generator(s) of an outcome that success can be sensibly proclaimed.
