

Trust

Trust ranks as one of the highest attributes that a person can possess. The strong nature of trust prevails within meaningful relationships. Trusting oneself signifies a confident and realized person, while trusting another, or being trustworthy, is more of a challenge.

The key to successful information flow predicates the trust placed on information flow and system flow. In the medical business environment, instruments that measure biomedical activities must be accurate and revealing. Medical professionals must be guaranteed that their devices are trustworthy. The same applies to all personnel within that profession.

Trust is built upon consistent interaction and the realization that those interactions confirm the intent and meaningfulness of the people involved. Trust rigidly consummates accuracy and satisfaction of the partnership. In a sense, trusting self and trustworthiness demand vigorous standards on what is being said and the validity of the actions taken by each person.

A trustworthy team is an absolute must in the medical and scientific business environment. Trust is also based on competency. How can you trust a person who is incompetent, unless you are a social worker trying to repair a person's behavior?

Trust also demands constant vigilance. One should never take trust for granted. It always should be evaluated, whether incurred deliberately or accidentally. Understand, trust only exists at the highest level, there are no seconds to trust. It exists or does not exist. Assuring trust prevails in the business and family environments is mandatory, and when achieved, relationships perpetuate, ideas flourish, and smiles are abounding.

By Robert V. Gerard

This article is copyrighted.

You have permission to share it through any medium provided the following is included:

"This article is copyrighted. Copyright@2018-2019 Dr. Robert V. Gerard,
Phone 607-724-2438; web www.oughten-house.com/oughtenstore/
E-mail contact@oughtenhouse.com."